TRIALS OF JOHN DITTO.

A Name That Was Always Bringing Its Owners Into Trouble.

His name was John Ditto, and it got him into all sorts of entanglements. When his name was written or printed in a list of other names it was often interpreted as meaning "the same as" the name immediately before it. The first time he went to St. Louis he signed his name on the hotel register "John Ditto," under the name of a man named Hinkleschneider, and the clerk, presuming that he had written "Ditto" merely to save time and ink, called him Mr. Hinkleschneider, and as "John Hinkleschneider, a prominent citizen of Somerville, Tex.," he was announced in the daily papers among the arrivals at the Laclede Hotel. News of this preceded him when he went back to Texas, and afterward he was as often called by the name Hinkleschneider as he was by his right name.

His name got him a wife, they said. At a country fair he was invited to join a friend and some young ladies in a refreshment tent. When the party was asked each to name his and her preference in the way of beverage, John said he would take lemonade, and the strange young lady next to him said she would take "ditto." This mild joke was cultivated, as such jokes are in rural neighborhoods, until the young lady was talked into really taking Ditto as her husband.

He escaped for a time, being drafted during the war, because his name, as copied off the original list, was given on the copy not as Ditto, but the surname as that of the man whose name preceded his.

One Element of Certainty.

Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
Wonder I how old you are;
Not yet sixty five, I bet,
Or you'd be a song and dance
soubrette.
